Marathon Senate meeting sees three hours of legislation

By Mike Stanton
THE COLLEGIAN

As members of the Student Senate's technology committee continued to promote a survey aimed at garnering student input on the development of a K-State mobile app, Ben Dewberry, co-founder of LigoSphere, LLC, spoke to Senators about a different sort of app. Dewberry's company is launching an app intended to, "(help) you keep up with what's happening on your college campus."

According to Dewberry, K-State is among five campuses that will have access to an alpha version of the app in the App Store and Google Play on April 3. Features of the app include postings of campus events, job and internship opportunities, food and drink specials, a "shop and swap" marketplace similar to Craigslist, a lost and found section and more.

Dewberry said the app will require a .edu email address to login, limiting its features to the respective campus communities.

After Dewberry's presentation, the Senate moved into legislation. With the final meeting of the session slated for next week, Senators spent more than three hours introducing and passing bills and resolutions.

Summary of Legislation

Passed:

Resolution 13/14/71: Resolution Supporting the Collegiate Housing and Infrastructure Act

Resolution 13/14/72: Approval of Amendments to the College Architecture Dean's Advisory Council

Aho moved to Manhattan from Chicago in 2012. She said she's still adjusting to life in a small town in the Midwest. Some changes have been small, such as the increase in the number of Christian stations on the radio; others have been larger.

Quiz Bowl Club buzzes about first national tournament

THE COLLEGIAN

In small room on the second floor of the K-State Student Union, 10 club members sit, buzzers in hand, attempting to answer questions ranging from history to philosophy to math. The questions and answers form a frame of reference for these Kansas State Quiz Bowl Club members that may come in handy when they travel to Chicago to compete in their first national tournament.

The club will compete at the Intercollegiate Championship Tournament, hosted by the National Academic Quiz Tournaments, LLC., this Saturday. Zach Amberger, senior in history; Jason Beets, senior in journalism and mass communications; Ben Detrixhe, a 2013 alumnus; Brian Hampel, senior in architecture; and Trevor Steiner, club president and senior in biology, will represent K-State while contesting for the national championship.

Last year, the team narrowly missed the at-large bid (an invitation to attend the tournament) which is determined by the intensity of a club's competition schedule and average points earned per game. With

Upcoming men's fashion masterminds, architects can be found in Little Apple

GEORGE WALKER | THE COLLEGIAN

Aaron Simon, freshman in apparel and textile marketing, said he thinks that it will take a couple more trendsetters receiving public attention before we see men on campus dressing more "avant-garde."

Casually worn ties aren't extremely common on the K-State campus today; often, they are only worn for Greek chapter meetings on Wednesdays, or when students have on-campus interviews and presentations.

Perhaps some K-Staters whom, when wandering around campus, wonder what the sidewalks would look like in-between classes if students dressed up more often. Others might wonder what would happen if dressing professionally all the time became the standard norm.

Between Gottschalk's fashion line and Simon's sense of style, they could be seen as challengers of conventional menswear. While Simon can keep it fairly traditional sometimes, his eclectic sense of fashion even extends to the beach.

"I'm more of a T-shirt and jeans kind of guy," Simon said. "I'm really into metallics, though. I actually have a pair of bright gold swim trunks. They actually reflect the sun. I get made fun of a lot."

While Simon said there are many different directions men's fashion could go in the future, he and Gottschalk are a group of fashion iconoclasts that are changing what it means to look stylish in a world of bros, swag and dudes, he said.

While some people may be cautious to experiment with new concepts like shapes, textures and colors, there are young designers, fashionistas and fashioneers at K-State poised to gain steam and step into the mainstream fashion spotlight.

BY AARON TURNER
THE COLLEGIAN

Some women's closets are stuffed to the brim with different clothing items and accessories: from shirts and sweaters, and pants to leggings; they have dresses for day and dresses for night; long necklaces, short shorts, and shoes galore. Women have that and so much more.

Many men, on the other hand, tend to stick to the bare essentials: a couple pairs of jeans, a few shirts, a suit and some sneakers seem to complete most of their closets for years on end.

"I feel like women like to accessorize more than men," Tez Meshesha, sophomore in human ecology, said.

Some people may feel like men don't know how to stay fashionable with current trends. While some men think of fashion as a touchy subject, others might just be too lazy to care.

"I just don't think people find an interest in it," Kimberly Gottschalk, sophomore in apparel and textile marketing, said.

Hidden interest

While perhaps not obvious, an argument can be made that interest is there – just under the surface. Some men might be afraid of their male counterparts judging them for spending too much time rooting through the closet and standing in front of the mirror.

"Men are a little bit more scared to go outside what's considered normal for menswear," Aaron Simon, freshman in apparel merchandising, said. "Men are just more apprehensive to go outside the box and experiment with different shapes, textures and colors."

However, it is hard not to notice a clear disparity in gender fashion in the past couple of years.

"When Lady Gaga came on the scene, womenswear became more voluminous and you had crazy shapes, big skirts and crazy glasses," Simon said. "I don't think a lot of guys would be willing to dress that avant-garde, but I think it will take a couple more trendsetters to move where it's headed."

Gottschalk said she agrees with Simon that men's fashion needs someone daring, like what Lady Gaga did for women's fashion.

"There needed to be a designer out there that made it different," Gottschalk said. "I thought that I could bring something to that."

Gottschalk is a designer, and her fashion line was recently featured at Kansas City Fashion Week in Kansas City, Mo.

"My style is kind of edgy, but I like to keep it classy as well," Gottschalk said.

Change doesn't have to be hard

Some male students tend to keep it traditional with T-shirts and jeans every day, and could find it difficult to imagine switching those out with a more professional or dapper look. However, it might not be as hard as they think.

"I really like ties too, even if it's like casually like when they are wearing like slacks and a button up," Gottschalk said. "I think that's, like, perfect."

K-State heads north for series at Creighton

By SPENCER LOW
THE COLLEGIAN

Last weekend, the K-State baseball team saw their 12-game winning streak snapped at the hands of the Oklahoma Sooners. However, after losing two games, they have rebounded with two straight wins heading into this weekend's matchup at Creighton.

After struggling on offense early in the season, K-State (15-9, 1-2 Big 12) is now hitting .305 as a team. A trio of upperclassmen lead the team with a .360 batting average: senior center fielder Ross Kivett, senior third baseman RJ Santigate, and junior shortstop Austin Fisher. Not far behind them is senior first baseman Shane Conlon, who is hitting .337. The four players have all started every game for the Wildcats this season, as head coach Brad Hill continues to rotate around several other positions on the diamond. Kivett has had an especially hot month, being named Big 12 Player of the Week on March 3 and hitting for the cycle Wednesday night against Nebraska.

Junior right fielder Mitch Meyer is another batter that has enjoyed a recent offensive surge; he was named Big 12 Player of the Week on March 17 and is batting .286 after a dismal start to his 2014 campaign. The Blue Valley alum is also tied for the team high in home runs with two, along with Kivett and Fisher.

The Bluejays (11-7-1) are fresh off an 11-0 defeat at the hands of Kansas, who held Creighton to four hits in the contest. However, the Bluejays have won 11 of their past 15 games and are 4-1 at home playing in TD Ameritrade Park in Omaha, Neb.

Creighton is having a rough go at the plate so far this season, hitting just .243 as a team. Only senior outfielder Brad McKewon is hitting above .300, with a .313 average so far this season. The senior also leads his team with seven doubles and is second on the squad with a .434 slugging percentage. Joining McKewon in the outfield is Mike Gerber, who leads the Bluejays with four homers and a .456 slugging percentage despite a .253 batting average.

Creighton has had success on the mound this season though, especially from their bullpen, starting with closer Bryan Sova. The right-hander is 1-0 with four saves this season and a minuscule 0.54 ERA in 16 1/3 innings. Sova has 12 strikeouts compared to just one walk, and has allowed a single run all season. Joining him in a stacked pen is John Oltman and his 0.75 ERA in 12 innings pitched and Nick Highberger with a 1.32 ERA in 13 2/3 innings.

First pitch tonight is slated for 6:30 p.m., followed by a 2 p.m. game Saturday and then the series finale at 1 p.m. on Sunday.

K-State to play Former Big 12 teams

By AUSTIN EARL
THE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's golf team is heading to Tuscon, Ariz. to take part in the Mountain View Collegiate three-round tournament this weekend. The event will start at 8 a.m. on Saturday and conclude on Sunday.

There are a total of 15 schools in the tournament, including former Big 12 foes Missouri and Nebraska. The Wildcats will look to build off a nice finish in the BYU Entrada Classic, where they placed in the top five.

The scoring lineup will consist of senior Gianna Misenhelter, juniors Olivia Eliasson and Carly Ragains, sophomore Scotland Preston, and freshman Katherine Gravel-Coursol. Freshman Anne Willman will play as an individual.

Wildcats prepare for weekend matchup with Sooners, Cowgirls

By JOHN ZETMEIR
THE COLLEGIAN

The No. 61 K-State tennis team will face stiff competition this weekend as they take on both the No. 18 Oklahoma Sooners and the No. 23 Oklahoma State Cowgirls.

The first of the two matches will begin today at 1 p.m. where K-State will face off with the Sooners. As a team, the Wildcats are 2-0 in Big 12 competition so far this season, but they will need a strong performance if they want to keep that conference record flawless. The Sooners enter the match after a win in their previous match against TCU.

The Wildcats will round out the weekend on Saturday against Oklahoma State at 1 p.m. The Cowgirls are also 2-0 in Big 12 play this season and come into Saturday coming off of a close win over Texas Tech.

If the weather permits, both matches will take place at the Mike Goss Tennis Stadium in Manhattan.

Political ‘sports teams’ choose sabotage over policy

RANDALL HELLMER
THE COLLEGIAN

Politics isn’t exactly fun these days. While a scandal or gaffe occasionally provides some levity to political proceedings, everything is usually deathly serious. Politicians are reaching for every lever they can find to gain even the slightest advantage over their opponents, and policy progress often takes a backseat to scoring political points. Everybody is afraid of losing the game of government, and that’s kind of a problem.

For a political parties, the greatest fear should instead be irrelevancy. Their entire existence is built on ideas, and an idea loses its power when no one thinks about it. It makes sense, then, that politicians want to keep their names in the headlines, and their policy proposals on the tip of everyone’s tongue.

I, for one, think they are watching too many sports movies.

When was the last time that the failure of an agenda was met graciously? The ongoing political brawl over healthcare is one of the most needlessly venomous and unproductive political conflicts in recent history, and it doesn’t have to be. Granted, it is a divisive issue, but nobody even seems to want to talk about the subject anymore because they’re too preoccupied with portraying their opponents as the “evil sports team” – the team that uses cheats and dirty tricks to beat the plucky bunch of misfits with actual heart.

Nobody wants to admit that they lost fair and square. When an agenda someone doesn’t approve of advances, or their own agenda stalls, the reaction is never, “We lost, but we’ll come back stronger next time. Time to hit the showers.” Every vote or political maneuver that blocks the progress of a political goal from either side is treated as a cheap trick by the loser, regardless of whether it’s a tactic they have in their playbook. Because, even when they don’t win, they want it to look like they should have.

It’s hard to know when this became such a big problem. It may be the advent of the televised political commentary, which has increasingly become a spectator sport, complete with blow-by-blow analysis. Or, it could be the absurd amount of coverage modern political elections garner. Coverage that places too much emphasis on the sideline action between candidates, rather than the issues being discussed.

Regardless, the problem is the same. Too much time and effort is being spent riding doomed efforts down in flames to score points. Politicians will push bills to a vote that have no chance of being passed, solely to cast their opponents as the bad player. Meanwhile, agendas that have a real chance of advancement are being ignored to deny a win to the other side.

Usually, even when there’s a compromise, one side will “lose.” They picked the wrong fight, or they just didn’t have as much leverage as the other side, so they get comparatively less from the deal. That’s a fact of life, not just politics. However, that fact has become unacceptable for politicians, because it would mean that they lost fair and square and that’s somehow frightening. So instead, any opportunity to get something done where a player of the other team might come out ahead is ignored. Because it’s all about winning now.

Political parties don’t die when they stop winning. They die because their core message becomes irrelevant to the evolving political landscape. That’s happening right now, because the messages of our political parties are taking a backseat to the spectacle of their conflict. While the game is fun to watch from the stands, it’s hard to care about its outcome when both sides have become the “evil sports team.”

State, value of high school education, diploma decreasing; no longer competitive edge

SOM KANDLUR
THE COLLEGIAN

The world is becoming increasingly competitive. With their GPAs or diplomas in hand, college students are constantly contending against each other for just about everything, like internships, part-time jobs and career opportunities. It’s weird to think that less than 40 years ago, a high school education and a can-do attitude was all it took to live a comfortable lifestyle.

However, the rules have changed. Having solely a high school education is next to worthless in today’s serious job market. A college level education is a prerequisite for most job listings and without it, you would be very lucky to even be considered for a comfortable, above minimum wage job. Whether this is right or wrong is up for debate. What isn’t up for debate though, is that young adults with some higher education behind them are much better off than their competitors who lack any.

Data from a Pew Research Center survey and analysis shows that young adults with only a high school diploma were more likely to live in poverty and be dissatisfied with their jobs, if they were not unemployed. If employed, the study states that they’ll earn approximately 62 percent of what the typical college graduate earns. According to the same study, this was about a $17,500 disparity in 2012.

The difference between a college and high school degree as your final academic qualification also changes the attitudes professionals have toward their jobs. The data from the Pew Research Center indicated that college graduates are more prone to consider their jobs as careers or a stepping-stone to careers. However, high school graduates were three times as likely to regard their jobs as “just a job to get by.”

Quality decline of high school education

There are two broad reasons as to why the value of a high school education has dropped so dramatically. The first is a fall in the quality of the education provided to students. In the last 40 years, the quality of high school education in the U.S. has stagnated. Schools can no longer provide students the tools necessary to succeed in the professional job market. Between this and the declining U.S. economy, the responsibility of education has been placed on the system of higher education, making college all but necessary.

One of the biggest problems that has caused the value of a high school education to drop so steeply has been the quality of the education that is currently being offered. According to an article published in “The Atlantic” in April 2011, “one-third or fewer of eighth grade students were proficient in math, science or reading.” In a 2012 report by ACT, Inc., the organization in charge of administering the national college entrance exams, data revealed that only 1 in 4 ACT-testing high school students were academically ready for college coursework in English, reading, math and science fields.

This indicates that today’s high schools are unable to give students the quality of education they did 30 years ago and, more importantly, are unable to prepare them for life in a professional setting. Students are ill-prepared to go to college as they lack the fundamental skills of reading and writing, as well as the comprehension of mathematical concepts. These skills are necessities in most professional spheres, whether it’s trading stocks or carpentry work.

In a Feb. 11 Slate article titled “What’s holding back American teenagers?,” author Laurence Steinberg presents a scathing indictment of the current American high school system. He states that, “over the past 40 years, despite endless debates about curricula, testing, teacher training, teachers’ salaries, and performance standards, and despite billions of dollars invested in school reform, there has been no improvement — none — in the academic proficiency of American high school students.”

Economy is shifting away from manufacturing

The second reason for the devaluation of a high school degree is due to a drastic shift in the American economy away from the manufacturing sector. One of the biggest reasons as to why a high school education was able to guarantee workers a comfortable standard of living was because of the American manufacturing sector during the 1970s. The increased demand for labor in order to meet the needs of a war-torn Europe meant that American companies were able to offer its workers a job with decent pay for work that was relatively easy to learn and did not require an extensive skill set as a prerequisite.

Today, a large number of manual tasks completed by the work force in the ‘70s can now be done more effectively with technology. Data from the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics released in 2011 shows a steady drop in jobs in the manufacturing sector. In 1970, the manufacturing sector accounted for just over 25 percent of all jobs within the U.S. That number was down to just 9 percent as of 2010. This means that the environment in which the high school diploma allowed people to live comfortable lives has been replaced by one which requires an expanded skill set and in-depth knowledge of various technological systems which a high school degree cannot provide.

A second indication by the charts released by the bureau was that, while demand for labor was down, there was a rise in demand for services in the health and professional sector. These sectors inherently require skills that can only be developed through extensive study – something that the high school system is unable to provide. Depending on only a high school education in such a scenario would therefore leave students under-prepared for the job market which would lead to unemployment or employment at a low-skill and low-paying job.

It is important to consider that are exceptions to everything. Bill Gates, Mark Zuckerberg and Steve Jobs are all prominent examples of people were able to do exceptionally well without graduating college. However, these examples represent a small section of people who managed to persevere and speak more to the character of the people than a success of the high school system. A high school education has the potential to be successful long-term, but not without drastic reform and even then there are certain skills that a high school education would simply not be able to develop due to the demands of the current economy. As a result, solely a high school education would be futile and you’re better off toughing out the remainder of your time at K-State. It’ll be worth it in the end.

Q: “Who was your favorite college instructor and why?”

BLAKE FRANKLIN

“Daniel Warner, he’s one of the graphics design professors, he’s encouraged us to create our own identity, to be creative, and given us the freedom and direction to go far as a graphic designer.”

ERIN WILSON
GRAD STUDENT,
LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE

“I would have to say Tim Keane, he’s very knowledgeable and understanding of what it means to go through the major that we go through. He’s very wise and offers great advice for students in our department. He’s very interested in how people learn and understand the material.”

EMMA BARNETT
POLITICAL SCIENCE

“My favorite instructor is Dr. Brianne Heidbreder, she teaches intro to US politics. I really appreciated her class because she gave an unbiased response to all of her political issues.”
